

|                               |                |
|-------------------------------|----------------|
| DOCUMENT                      | FIELD NOTES    |
| COMPILED FROM 2 YEARS ON SITE |                |
| SUBJECT                       | QUOTE HANDLING |
| STATUS                        | OPEN ISSUES    |

FIELD REPORT — MOVING INDUSTRY

7 MISTAKES COSTING YOU CUSTOMERS BEFORE THEY EVEN CALL BACK

What two years working inside moving companies taught me about where deals are actually won and lost — starting with the single biggest one.

READ BEFORE YOUR NEXT LEAD

MOST OF IT ISN'T YOUR TRUCKS. IT'S THE MOMENT BEFORE YOU GET THE JOB.

Over the past two years I've watched how leads actually move through moving companies — from the first WhatsApp message to the truck showing up on move day. Most lost jobs have nothing to do with price, crew quality, or reviews. They're lost in the gap between a customer asking "how much?" and someone finally answering.

Here are the seven mistakes I keep seeing — starting with the one that quietly costs the most.

ITEM NO. 01 – URGENT

NOT ANSWERING QUOTES INSTANTLY

When someone asks for a moving quote, they've almost always messaged three or four companies at the same time. The job usually doesn't go to whoever has the best price or the nicest trucks — it goes to whoever replies first with a real number. If your process is "someone will get back to you today," you are losing a large share of those leads to a competitor who answered in five minutes, before the customer even finished comparing options.

THE FIX

An automated instant quote system. The customer enters a few basics — move size, distance, extras — and gets a real price back in seconds, day or night, weekends included. You receive the lead already qualified, with a price already on the table, instead of starting the conversation from zero.

ITEM NO. 02

ASKING THE WRONG QUESTIONS UPFRONT

"How many rooms?" doesn't actually tell you what a move costs. Stairs, elevator access, parking distance from the truck, and bulky items do. Without asking for these upfront, quoting turns into several rounds of back-and-forth messages — and every extra round is a chance for the customer to give up and go with whoever answered faster.

ITEM NO. 03

NO WRITTEN CONFIRMATION BEFORE MOVE DAY

A verbal price over the phone feels fine until move day, when the final number doesn't match what the customer remembers. That gap is where almost every bad review starts. A short written confirmation — even a simple message recapping the price and inventory — protects both sides and heads off disputes before they happen.

ITEM NO. 04

UNDERQUOTING TO WIN THE JOB

Giving a low number to close the deal, then adding fees on move day, wins the job once and costs far more later. Egyptian Facebook groups move fast — one post about hidden charges reaches more people than months of ads ever will.

ITEM NO. 05

NO FOLLOW-UP ON LEADS THAT DON'T BOOK RIGHT AWAY

Not everyone books on the first message. Without a simple follow-up — even one message a day or two later — those leads just disappear, even though a real share of them would have booked with a small nudge.

ITEM NO. 06

DETAILS THAT DON'T REACH THE CREW

The person who quotes the job usually isn't the person on the truck. When details don't transfer cleanly, the crew shows up not knowing about the piano on the fourth floor with no elevator. It's rarely a crew problem — it's a missing handoff, usually fixed with a standard job sheet.

ITEM NO. 07 — LEAD TRACKING

NOT ALL LEADS ARE WORTH CHASING THE SAME WAY

Without basic tracking — where a lead came from, what quote it got, whether it's still open — every inquiry gets treated the same. Some are ready to book today. Others are just comparing prices for next month. Knowing the difference saves hours a week.

CLOSING NOTE

FIXING #1 ALONE CHANGES THE NUMBERS

Of all seven, the instant-quote problem is the one I've seen fix itself fastest once it's addressed. It doesn't take more staff, better ads, or lower prices — it just takes answering before the other company does.

Want to see what an instant quote setup would look like for your business?

Email me and I'll walk you through it and make you a free demo tailored to your business — saifwale0424@gmail.com